The History of Hunting.
The recent newly awakened interest in the life and times of King Alfred, due to the celebration of the thousandth anniversary of his death, and the placing of a statue at his birthplace, has resulted in some interesting information on the evolution of the sportsman. One may see, by reviewing the customs and conditions of Alfred's time, how it was that hunting came to be regarded as the noblest of all amusements. It was absolutely necessary to the safety and welfare of the people that the wolves, bears, wild boars, and other dangerous animals which then roamed over England, should be exterminated, and, of course, the king and his knights, as the bravest and best armed of the fighting population, were setting a good example and doing good service in their hunting parties. These conditions continued for some hundreds of years and the nobility of the sport of hunting became firmly established and hedged about with many traditions as to the proper method of killing the game. The persistence of traditions in England is proverbial, and hence, after the whole country became as safe as a barnyard, people continued to suppose that there was something essentially courageous in deer-stalking and grouse-shooting.

The question now confronted by the intelligent American citizen is this; whether it is necessary for a new country to take over the ideas and conventions of its parents on this subject. Are we to consider a man a sportsman because he kills rabbits and pigeons, as his father killed bears and panthers? Is the man who takes his sport with rod and gun any more manly or brave than the one who arms himself with a camera or a microscope? The Englishman would probably say yes, because he was brought up to believe so.
The fact seems to be, however, that mere ability to go popping about with a gun does not constitute sportsmanship. The old-time huntsman, encountering a stag at bay with the primitive weapons of his day certainly did need to be brave; his modern prototype, armed with a repeating rifle is generally safe, the animal is the one who needs courage. The idea that there is some peculiar manliness in shooting hermitic animals, let us hope, a vanishing illusion.

FEAR MORE BLOODSHED.

Condition of Ominous Unrest at Providence, Ky., and Other Mining Points.

RESULT OF THE BATTLE OF SUNDAY.

Union Men Believed to Have Suffered Severely in the Attack—At Least 1,000 Shots Fired During the Fight—More Troops Are Expected on the Scene.

Madisonville, Ky., Nov. 19.—The man who was killed in the battle at Providence, Sunday morning, Garrett Grew, is a negro living here. Bud Couch, mortally wounded, is also a negro, and both were union men in the attacking party. There are the wounded were non-union men, negroes who were guarding the mine. There is a report that two wounded men were taken to the hospital, but it is believed that they are all dead, having been shot while attacking the mine.

The report lacks verification, though it is believed that the men who made the attack suffered very greatly from the fight.

In the battle of Sunday morning at least 1,000 shots were fired while in the battle of the week-end that number were fired. Early Monday morning a portion of the Madisonville company and some of the Hopkinsville company were sent to Providence. The men are under the command of Capt. Thomas. The town is now under guard by the soldiers. A terrible state of affairs exists here.

Not only at Providence, but all over Hopkins county and at Empire, in Christian county, there is a state of unrest, and one is expected at a moment's notice that more troops are expected.

After Hatterer's Miners.
Commander George Hatterer, of the 1st Supton, is both at Providence, and under their directions part of the soldiers on duty there are scouring the country in an effort to discover other members of the union party who are engaged in Sunday's battle. The report that the lieutenant of a military company led Sunday's attack is without foundation.

George Couch, the negro union miner who was shot Sunday, is said to have given the authorities valuable information as to the location of the attack before his death. Warrants have been issued for alleged participants in Sunday's fighting. It is thought that the list will be sent to this county immediately.

One Mine Running.
One of the mines of the Providence company is running, but the large mine, on which the attack was made, is idle. This is true because of the excitement, the disorganized force and the coming of so many troops here Sunday.

It is said the St. Bernard and other coal companies of Hopkins county have decided to take up foreign elements in the protection in the United States court.

Discipline Responsibility.
The union officials here disclaim responsibility for Sunday's attack, but say that the men who were implicated in Sunday's affair acted on their own responsibility. Orders were issued by President Hill and General Council W. P. Clough, of the Northern Securities company, declined to talk Monday concerning the statement made by Gov. Van Sant of Minnesota to the effect that he would do all in his power to prevent any consolidation of the Great Northern and Northern Pacific.

NATURAL GAS EXPLOSION.

Members of Repair Gang Injured While Fixing a Leak by Torch Light.

Washington, Pa., Nov. 19.—A natural gas explosion occurred along the main gas line of the Wheeling Gas company at Hartsburg, eight miles west of here, which resulted in injuries to six men, two of whom will probably die. The explosion was caused by the gas ignited from a torch in the hands of one of the repairmen.

The big gas main of the Wheeling Gas company sprung a leak near Buffalo and the company sent out a repair party. The gas was turned off all day and the men were at work in a deep ditch making the repairs. As darkness fell several torches were used to give the men light.

The repairs were almost completed, when, through some mistake, the gas was turned on at the gates and some rushing along through the main with great pressure. Brossell, ignorant of the fact that the gas had been turned on, was holding the torch near an opening, and the explosion resulted.

Thanksgiving Homecoming

By MARION DENISON

"I'm not too late for Letty to have back, father," said Mr. Harlow, breaking the silence that had long reigned in the room. Her husband rose stately and crossed to the window.

"She's just comin' into view," he said, his eyes on the point where the village road emerged from the screen unimpeded by his own orchard. His face brightened as the lithe young figure came briskly along beneath the arch of winter boughs. Letty always conveyed the message of abounding, radiant joy. In a moment she spied him and waved her muff joyfully.

"The Harlow house was but slightly removed from the street, its severe, uncompromising front unadorned save for the fan light above its green door. Letty's deprecating eyes fixed on the door as she hurried in at the side gate. It had always been a trial to her here, but her petitions that it be replaced by the more modern make, her father had unexpectedly turned a deaf ear. So it had stood in his father's day, and so it should remain white he had any say in the matter."

"Something uncommon must have happened to Letty, mother," Mr. Harlow said, as the girl waved a letter in passing through the window. "Letty is always bubbling over about something," she said placidly. "It bears all the amount of pleasure she gets out of every thing. And she ain't one to be always asking for things, either."

"That's so—that's so," her husband assented. "but something's a-comin' to me, I'll be bound," and he turned eagerly to the pretty vision that at that moment appeared in the doorway. "It's a letter from John, with such a wonderful surprise! You read it, father," Letty urged, thrusting it into his hands. Mrs. Harlow, looking at the pretty face with its streaming dimples and radiant eyes, smiled sympathetically at her impatience, while Mr. Harlow fumbled for his glasses, and, dropping the window to catch the fading light upon the sheet, began to read. But, after the opening sentences, Mrs. Harlow forgot her father's presence, and she dropped to the glimmering needles and the comely old face betrayed no sign of the inward perturbation with which she listened to her son's project. Mr. Harlow's eyes were fixedly on the reading, shifting impatiently as if for better light, and clearing his throat at intervals. The letter ran thus:

convenient when we get used to 'em. You mustn't be surprised if I look rather and a few minutes to grasp the notion. There, now—if I ain't forgot the apples I was holdin' for supper!" and also vanished in the kitchen.

"That father—Mr. Harlow was still perturbed. Mr. Letty took the basket cheeks between his hurrying hands and looked fondly down into the troubled eyes. "Go ahead with your house, Letty," he said. "Mother and I agree pretty well on most things, and I guess we think it's about time you had some things as you want 'em. Because we're used to old ways don't prove 'em to be best. Besides, there's John's wishes to be thought about. It's remembered that view all these years—a mighty pretty prospect and a real snugly place for a home."

That night, when the glimmer of Letty's bedroom candle was lost in the darkness of the upper hall, Mr. Harlow softly closed the door and tiptoed across the rag carpet to his wife, reading her Bible by the kerosene lamp.

"It's goin' to come harder to you than to me, this leavin' the old home," he said, tenderly. "Letty is a good girl and will give it up without a murmur if you say the word."

His wife put up her hand to the toll-iron one upon her shoulder, "It's you I'm thinkin' of, Sammel," she smiled wistfully up at him. "It was your father's home before you, and the Harlows were always master-hands to stick by the old thing, and so I'm thinkin' of you."

"If it's for me you're worryin', we'll let her have her way," he said, sturdily. "And, after all, the old place'll be right here, I ain't a-goin' to sell it." Letty never knew how near she had approached to disappointment.

The next great in the new house, at first simulated, soon became genuine as the parents listened to Letty's happy plans. By March their wishes were well formulated, and on a mid-day that gave treacherous promise of spring, Letty started for the city to engage an architect. The journey was short, and, in a brief time, she found herself whisked aloft in an elevator and deposited at the door of "R. Ellsworth, Architect."

This particular person having been recommended by a friend of her father. Feeling somewhat nervous at the magnitude of her undertaking, Letty timidly knocked. A chair grated on the floor within and when the door opened a young man, with quick bearing but alert glance, bowed gravely to her.

"The Mr. Ellsworth within?" she stammered. "I would like to see him upon business." He stepped back to allow her entrance, then bowed courteously again. "I am Mr. Ellsworth," he said, as Letty was about to advance toward a middle-aged man, busy with drafting tools in the north window.

"Letty could not suppress the exclamation; then flushed crimson. "—Why, I expected an older man," she said, helplessly, then was doubly chagrined at her frankness. A glimmer of an idea appeared in the young man's eyes; then, with a quick perception of what would set her caller at ease, let his amusement have full sway. At that moment Letty joined him and laughed until the tears stood in her eyes.

is just what I would like to build for myself," he declared with conviction and in just such a place.

It was early in October that, at last, they entered it and took possession. Letty, full of rejoicing over the new windows, the hardwood finish, the color scheme and charming view, felt little sorrow as she denuded the old house to make habitable the new. But, to her father and mother, this forsaking of walls hallowed by old and tender memories was filled with unutterable regret. And when the day was turned upon the edging course, now no longer home, the old people looked into each other's eyes for the comfort that neither could give.

Letty fluttered down the hill to meet them. "It is all ready, now," she said, breathlessly. "Except the hanging of a few pictures! I'm so glad there was enough money left from the new carpets and hangings. It has made it so much more beautiful!" Laughing and chattering she drew them from room to room, pointing out each individual charm and comfort, unheeding the objections of fort with which they tried to share in her joy.

"I wonder where mother is," Letty murmured one golden day, a week later, as a half-bird's foot lay in the meadow basket by a window overlooking the old home; but mother was not to be found. "I'll run down to the other house," the girl thought, uneasily, and, throwing a soft scarf about her head, hurried along the road and past the orchard. Turning the knob of the green door, she found it locked, so slipped around the side of the house, placing in at the window as she passed. Suddenly she shrank back into the shelter of the lilacs, for in the dismantled living-room she had discovered her mother, crouched on the dusty floor, forlornly gazing before her with unseeing eyes.

"If you don't mind"—her voice trembled a little—"let's drive down to the other house first. John will be sure to see it. And, if you crossed her father's face and her mother started to speak, but thought better of it. Letty should not dream what it cost her to see the deserted house on Thanksgiving day. Would it—could it seem like Thanksgiving in the new house?"

One past the orchard, they rattled. Letty's tongue rained more gaily than ever, though the rest were silent. Thus far her father and mother had not ventured to look out the clear old place, let its solitude reproach them; but, as they drew up before the gate, the green door flew open and Sarah came, smiling and hearty, beckoned them in.

"It's pretty frosty yet," she urged. "Come right in when it's warm." "Warm?" quavered Mrs. Harlow, her gaze was fixed upon the shining windows by which the old house welcomed him, as if with friendly eyes. "And, springing to the ground, Letty tenderly extended her arms. "Come, mother," she said, unsteadily, "let's go in and see what a fine view with happiness. "This is his home."

The dear old things had once more settled back into their accustomed places, and Mrs. Harlow's old profession had found place, it was careful not to infringe upon the sweet familiarity.

"I've had a chance to tell you something important," he said, in an undertone, drawing her to the window. "I had an hour between trains, I ran out to see the new house, the man in whose charge you have put the new house. What do you suppose he told me? Nothing less than that he has found a purchaser already!"

"Aren't you certain yet?" her father asked, anxiously. "Oh, yes—of course I am well," the girl answered, brightly, smiling up at him. But when she escaped to the hall and half-way up the stairs, paused to look out through the diamond pane at the brown fields below, she saw them through a mist of tears. "I do love it so!" she whispered, passionately; but there was no answer in her gesture.

A week later Letty received a letter from John, but this she did not show. "All right. Do as you think best," it said. "Their happiness is my first consideration," which, though brief, was vastly comforting. Errands soon called Letty to the city, from which she returned tired and pale. Soon, however, she was apparently her old self again. The household was subsiding for the winter, when an urgent invitation came to Mr. and Mrs. Harlow to visit a cousin in a neighboring town. "Of course we can't go," Mr. Harlow said, decidedly, though her eyes had brightened at the prospect. "It will do you both a world of good, and you haven't seen Cousin Mary since she was a sick. Don't you think you ought to go?" The wily girl knew how to pull the strings. "But she wants us to stay two weeks," her mother objected, with a sigh. "I'm sorry. That brings it right up to Thanksgiving. It is so dreadfully late to ask you to go."

"Oh, I'll get Sarah Duncan to see to the house for me," Letty said, easily. "I'd just love to have my own way for awhile." And, eventually, the girl had her way, starting her travelers on their journey with a relief that could hardly be named. "It leaves so little time," she sighed, "but, with help, it shall be done."

Not until Thanksgiving day did Cousin Mary relax her hold upon her guests, her hospitable intentions being made more effective by her efforts from Letty urging them not to hurry home. It was near noon when Letty drove to meet her parents, and, as she stepped out of the carriage, she had laid its reins upon the fields and hedgerows. She eagerly scanned the long train, as it rolled into the station in front of the homestead, and, within the next few moments, her eyes were fixed on a young man, his hair as black as ever, and entirely free from dandruff. "That's the man who removed the defect," said the driver, a delightful hair dressing for regular use.

"Distinction." "What's the difference 'tween gastronomy an' jes' plain common cookin'?" "Gastronomy is jes' nackerly cookin' called." "But—"

MR. HARLOW STUMBLED OCCASIONALLY IN THE READING.

Part of the meaning of it flashed into Letty's mind. To be sure, this was the birthday of Serena—little Serena, who died so many years ago, but who yet lived in the mother's heart. Letty was touched, and longed to reach her mother and comfort her; yet all that she could do was to stand back to the front of the house and there, pacing back and forth in the sunshine, wait until her mother emerged from the shadow. Here Mrs. Harlow found her when her sad sobs were put away.

"Why, Letty," she tried to say with her wonted brightness, "with brought you here? I thought I'd slip down for a few minutes, and see if all was right." But Letty was not to be evaded. "You have been thinking about Serena, dear," she said, lovingly, laying her cheek against the faded one, long since furrowed by tears.

"Yes," Mrs. Harlow said, simply, forgetting her role of cheerfulness. "It just had to come for a little while. She seems nearer to me in the old house."

And then Letty's eyes were opened.

It was not many days before the elders noticed a change in the girl. There was a new gentleness in her manner, a vague wistfulness, that puzzled her readers.

"Aren't you certain yet?" her father asked, anxiously.

"Oh, yes—of course I am well," the girl answered, brightly, smiling up at him. But when she escaped to the hall and half-way up the stairs, paused to look out through the diamond pane at the brown fields below, she saw them through a mist of tears. To P. E. Fredline—
Take notice that the following described piece of land situated in the County of Pine and State of Minnesota, to-wit:
The North East quarter of North East quarter (No. 67) in Section 22 in Township 33 North of Range 20 West, was, on the 2nd day of May, 1898, bid in for the State of Minnesota, for the sum of $150, at a tax sale of lands held pursuant to a real estate tax judgment made and entered in the District Court in and for said County, on the 21st day of March, 1898, in proceedings to enforce the payment of taxes delinquent upon real estate for the year 1897, for the said County, and on the 14th day of October, 1898, the County Auditor of said County, by direction of the State Auditor, sold and conveyed said land in fee simple for the sum of $115, the amount due thereon, with interest thereon at one per cent per month from the said 14th day of October, 1898, together with the costs to accrue for the service of this notice, and the time for the redemption of said land from said tax sale will expire sixty days after the service of this notice and proof thereof has been filed in my office.
Dated this 16th day of October, 1901.
D. O'GRIFF,
Auditor (Seal) Auditor Pine County, Minn.
